Washington is said to have been a patron of this place of amusement, when showing at Philadelphia, where the "Circus" was located on Market Street, corner of Twelfth, from October, 1792, until it went to Boston in the spring of 1795: it remained in the latter city several months and then it returned to Philadelphia, where it was destroyed by fire December, 1799. The token therefore has a local reference to both cities.

The dies for this piece, which made its appearance a number of years after the war, were engraved by Lovett (of Philadelphia), whose initial it bears, and the obverse is the same as he cut for his own card in 1859. It is not believed that the proposed issue was the inception of the Confederate authorities, but rather that of the maker as a speculative venture, who never found a fitting opportunity to carry out his purpose.

SPANISH PROCLAMATION PIECES.

Perhaps the most extensive line ever offered in America. It is concluded all were used as currency, and their near conformation to the size of the ½, 1, 2 and 4 Reals is regarded as strong evidence in support of this theory; therefore they combine the interest of both coin and medal. All are above common.

The following pieces have more or less likeness to coins, with portraits, arms, values, etc., struck from dies, (with few exceptions); used by money changers and merchants throughout Europe, to test the value or genuineness of the miscellaneous gold, so freely circulating.
